Conceptualizing Indigenous Citizenship:
Equal, differentiated, and shared citizenship

This paper discusses indigenous citizenship as a specific type of dual (or multiple) citizenship that challenges many of our traditional understandings of citizenship.

In particular, the paper draws from the notion of ‘citizenship as shared fate’ (Williams), and analyses some of the benefits and disadvantages of this notion to our understanding of indigenous citizenship, and the different elements of citizenship (legal, participatory and psychological) thereof. The paper concludes by calling for a modified notion of citizenship that takes many of the benefits of the shared fate theories into account, while avoiding some of the downfalls of these theories via a form of political liberalism.
